The Ph.D. Programme in Cultural and Differential Psychology gives in-depth knowledge on the cultural understanding of personality and individual differences. While the mainstream psychology is dominated by research coming from the US and other English speaking countries, the new wave in modern psychology is shifting the focus of attention on culturally embedded construction of personality and individual differences. The aim of the Ph.D. Programme is to study how culture creates the human personality and how individuals, in turn, contribute to the formation of culture. The "global" culture is another central topic of research and instruction, as are the virtual world and the social networks. The Ph.D. programme provides training in the full range of academic activities - research, teaching, and administration of courses.

The programme reflects the multicultural essence of the European Union and forms high level competence in dealing with problems of intercultural adaptation, in helping multicultural teams and in prevention of conflicts at individual and group level. On completion of the Ph.D. studies, the doctoral students develop expert knowledge and skills in intercultural mediation. They are prepared to consult individuals, groups and governments on finding solutions to conflicts arising in multicultural environments and in the global modern world.
